

All About Pandas

Pandas are cute, gentle animals that are famous for their black and white fur. They mostly live in the bamboo forests of China. Pandas have round faces, small ears, and strong bodies that help them climb trees and move through the forest. They are shy animals and spend most of their time alone or with their mothers.

Pandas are herbivores, which means they eat mostly plants. Their favorite food is bamboo, which they eat for several hours every day. Sometimes, pandas eat small animals or eggs, but this is very rare. Pandas have strong jaws and teeth to chew the tough bamboo stems. They are slow-moving animals, but they are very good climbers and swimmers.

Baby pandas, called cubs, are born very small, weak, and pink. They stay close to their mother in a safe den for protection and to grow stronger. Cubs drink their mother's milk until they can eat bamboo and other foods. Pandas are very playful, and cubs often roll and climb around while learning important skills.

Pandas are endangered because their forests are being cut down and there is less bamboo to eat. Conservation groups and panda reserves in China are working to protect them and plant more bamboo. Saving pandas helps keep forests healthy and ensures that these lovable animals can continue to live in the wild.

Comprehension Questions :

Where do pandas mostly live?

---

What is the main food of pandas?

---

What are baby pandas called?

---

Why are pandas good climbers?

---

Why do pandas need protection today?

---

True or False :

Pandas are gentle animals with black and white fur.

Pandas eat mostly meat.

Baby pandas are called cubs.

Pandas are very fast runners.

Conservation groups help protect pandas and plant more bamboo.